found him dead, the wound being conſiderably ſwelled and gangrened, as alſo the edges round the ſwelling.

Upon opening the body, the liver was found ſomewhat larger than uſual, with ſpots of a livid purple, as in the bodies of perſons dead of the plague: In the ſtomach was found a quantity of black coagulated blood, of the ſize of a hen's egg; this in all likelihood was what he had ſwallowed, upon licking the wound. The heart was very large, with a black grumous blood in the ventricles, and the auricles were turned blackiſh and gangrenous.

An Account of an Experiment made with the Bile of Perſons dead of the Plague.

TWO dogs were made to ſwallow a pretty large quantity of the bile taken from the bodies of perſons dead of the plague.

Upon this the dogs appeared heavy and melancholy, refuſed their food, and made water very often, eſpecially when they were any ways diſturbed; their urine was thick, and very fetid, and their groſs excrements tinged with the black and greeniſh bile they had ſwallowed. But in a few days thoſe accidents went of, and the dogs perfectly recovered.
